Something About "Office Seekers."

Of all the passions that move, regulate, govern and often infatuate individuals, the love of political preferment, of publie office, beats all. It makes small men absolutely ridiculous, and a great man, eringing to every rascal whom he thinks office seeker amy he known by his coungrasp your arm with the greatest apparent cordiality, ask you cone roing the state of your health, how you prosper. how he has long been desiring to see you how he thought you must be absent from town on important business, and so on through the whole catechism which filial affection would suggest as the inquiries of a brother until he found occasion to mount to the important climax of " how do you stand on the matter of political nominathis paper and go out upon the streets. you will encounter one of this species who is not quite sure of your political predilections and sympathics, and who is anx ious to ascertain whether he can rely upon remorse and regret unless the commona load of responsibilities, which to them onel, at the early age of 23 years, tooks like a sack of greenbacks.) many The reader may remember the honest and conscientious men do not un-

Would it then be portion the bad men who took up arms to overthrow the Union, or those more guilty who, pursuing profitable callings or filling rich sinecures within the robel lines, abandoned their property to military capture.

Your honorable House will, therefore I am persuaded, on reflection, see how monstrous the distinction would be which this act proposes to sanction, and cannot fail to appreciate truly the just indigna-tion which an attempt to relieve transently deserving, must necessarily excite throughout the length and breadth of the land. I feel profoundly for the distress of every class and description of our fellow citizens, and would gladly relieve them, but the first claimants upon sympathy are those who have clung fast to their duty, to their country. This act, then, is in my opinion, in the highest degree objectioable, I return it unapproved.
